Classroom of the Elite is a thrilling anime with rich psychological themes. It's based on Shōgo Kinugasa's light novel series. The show follows Ayanokoji and his impact on Class 1-D in Tokyo Metropolitan Advanced Nurturing High School. Kiyotaka Ayanokoji is the intelligent protagonist who hides his gifts, sparking curiosity about his motives. In Season 2, Episode 10 revealed the "White Room," a crucial part of Ayanokoji's childhood. Based on the Classroom of the Elite light novels, here are key things to know about the White Room: The White Room was created by Professor Ayanokoji as an academic institution to develop the perfect education system. It had extreme standards for 20 generations, with different teachers and students each time. The goal was to test their training processes and find a formula to create natural-born geniuses like Arisu Sakayanagi. Despite its efforts, the White Room had limited success in creating ideal students. Its main aim was to prove that genius is born from situational circumstances, negating the idea of natural-born geniuses. The White Room aimed to develop a perfect genius-creating formula to nurture incredibly intelligent students for Japan's advancement. The White Room's grueling curriculum and self-reliance-based education system pushed its students to their limits, often leaving them struggling to adapt to the outside world. Only a handful of generations truly excelled, with the 4th and 5th generations producing impressive results. The 4th generation, known for their harsh education and emphasis on individualism, saw most of their peers fail under extreme pressure. However, Kiyotaka Ayanokoji stood out as an exceptional student who aced every test. In contrast, the 5th generation focused more on communication skills, but many members struggled to connect with non-White Roomers like Takuya Yagami. Despite this, Ayanokoji remains a standout figure in White Room history, having excelled in all subjects and earning his father's praise as "his most prized possession." Nevertheless, the White Room's ultimate goal of creating more Ayanokoji-like students has yet to be achieved. His fame also bred jealousy and hatred among some peers, who felt pressure to live up to his exceptional standards. After being shut down for a year, Ayanokoji escaped to explore the outside world and joined Class 1-D as an observer, where he continues to keep his true intentions hidden. The mysterious White Room has long been a topic of intrigue in the Classroom of the Elite series. While the Advanced Nurturing High School is competitive, the White Room stands out as an even more enigmatic institution. What lies within its walls? What are its goals, and why is it so shrouded in controversy? The White Room is a pivotal yet contentious entity in the Classroom of the Elite series. Its true nature as an experimental facility where students are subjected to inhumane treatments to cultivate exceptional intellects at the expense of their emotional well-being is deeply disturbing. The system's sole focus on creating geniuses, rather than nurturing well-rounded individuals, raises significant concerns about its morality. Professor Ayanokoji's past and his involvement with the White Room remain shrouded in mystery. While some speculate that he could have effortlessly secured a spot in A-Class if he had applied himself more diligently, Ayanokoji's deliberate maintenance of average grades and surveillance of peers suggest a more complex narrative. The White Room itself is a secretive institution founded 20 years ago by Professor Ayanokoji's father. It operates under unconventional methods aimed at stripping away attributes that hinder intellectual development. With 19 generations of students having passed through its doors, each generation faces distinct educational approaches and leadership styles. Notably, the "Demonic Fourth Generation" stands out for its individualistic and demanding ethos, resulting in a high dropout rate. Only Kiyotaka Ayanokoji emerged unscathed from this era, demonstrating an exceptional aptitude that remains a subject of intrigue in the series. The White Room, an institution run by Professor Ayanokoji, is a mysterious and controversial part of Classroom of the Elite's lore. Despite its legal existence, the room's dealings are hidden from the public eye. Ayanokoji believes that genius is created, rather than born, and subjects students to an inhumane education system. The 5th generation students, like Takuya Yagami and Ichika Amasawa, possess a unique skillset that allows them to converse with their peers without effort. However, this comes at the cost of their emotional development, as they remain unfazed and devoid of human emotions. Ichika's admiration for Ayanokoji is rooted in his success story, which she sees as her idol. On the other hand, Arisu Sakayanagi views Ayanokoji with disdain due to his awareness of her upbringing. The White Room's true nature and purpose remain unknown, but its impact on the students is undeniable. The educational landscape has undergone significant changes across generations in the White Room series. Unfortunately, the show hasn't provided much insight into the goals or student names for its first three generations. As a result, we currently have no concrete information to share on this topic. Any future revelations from the light novels will prompt us to update this article promptly. However, with regards to Generation Four, it's worth noting that individualism was the primary focus of the White Room's curriculum. The rigorous coursework proved too challenging for nearly all students, leading to either dropout or failure in their final exams. Despite these setbacks, they did manage to absorb valuable lessons on independence. One notable student from this generation is Kiyotaka Ayanokoji, who later became a main character in the series. Given his connection as Professor Ayanokoji's son, it comes as no surprise that he was enrolled at the White Room, which profoundly influenced his personality. Interestingly, he chose to escape and resist returning, defying his father's wishes. For Generation Five, communication and collaboration took center stage. Unfortunately, this generation failed to form meaningful connections with each other. Two students from this era have been identified: Ichika Amasawa and Takuya Yagami. The former is an admirer of Ayanokoji due to her respect for his achievements, while the latter exhibits a different personality profile and is seen as a genuinely kind individual.
