Payment Methods accepted by seller In the winter of 1976-77, my brother and I were obsessed with a dictionary-sized book published by the Readers Digest Association. (At that time, at age 9, I thought the magazine was pronounced Readers Diggest, meaning it was packed with articles that readers really dug. man. What can I say? The seventies were hard on all of us.)The book had a red marbled cover and sober blue binding, with the title embossed in bold gilt lettering: Strange Stories, Amazing Facts. There was no subtitle. There was no need for one the title promised everything we wanted, and lucky for us, the book delivered.On long car trips, wed sit in the back seat fighting over whose turn it was to explore chapters such as Strange customs and superstitions, Hoaxes, frauds and forgeries, and Eccentrics and prophecies. We thrilled to photographs of the Loch Ness Monster, Sri Lankan fire walkers and O-Kee-Pa, The Torture Test, wherein young men of the Mandan tribe of Indians endured a brutal and horrific rite of passage that culminated in chopping off their own pinky fingers.We learned that people sometimes spontaneously combust, and that an Italian monk named Padre Pio suffered Christlike wounds in his hands called stigmata. We discovered that pigs were flogged in medieval France for breaking the law, and that the entire crew of the Mary Celeste disappeared one day, leaving the ship to float empty around the Atlantic. We became acquainted with Anastasia, the supposed Romanov survivor; and Spring-Heeled Jack, a demon who leapt about London in the 19th century, spitting blue flames in the faces of young women. We never wanted to read anything else, ever.Not long ago, I bought a copy of Strange Stories, Amazing Facts on Ebay, and its just as riveting today as it was when I was 9. But now the best part to read is the final chapter: The World of Tomorrow. Cutting edge predictions from 1976:By the end of this century, giant tugs may be plying the South Atlantic, towing icebergs seven miles long to water the green fields of the Sahara.It looks as if the day of the wheel is over. (illustrated by a photo of an experimental monorail system)Robot trucks could end road chaosPilots may soon be able to fly simply by thinkingAnd my favorite:With concentrated, well-funded research, within a decade, the United States could have a solar industry that would supply a good proportion of our power needs.
